Foreword

the compiling of this book is more than a merely formal list of names. It is a sincere tribute of deep affection; it is an evidence and pledge of our remembrance and our gratitude. These young men and women whose names are inscribed, though trained only in the arts of peace, and imperfectly understanding the issue, hesitated not to enter the tragic tournaments of death in order that civilization might be preserved and that the principles for which their fathers fought should not pass from man's possession.

We are far enough away from the Mar to realize its unspeakable waste, its cruel slaughter, its aftermath of loneliness and sorrow and broken hearts. Yet to-day the European world still totters blindly down the road of discord and misunderstanding. War to-day has no longer glory in its methods nor in its results. Its only glory is the glory of the sacrifice for an ideal which it involves. The remembrance of the bravery of our fellow men who died for an ideal ought to remain with us as an inspiration, that we may draw strength for the duties of peace and that generations yet unborn may learn that by fortitude and fidelity, by endurance and determination, the darkest hour may be turned into one of radiant achievement.

They shall grow not old, as we that are left grow old;

Age shall not weary them, nor the years condemn.
